Trend-setting male engagement rings and wedding bands feature unique materials such as palladium, titanium, tungsten and black diamonds

MODESTO, Calif., August 31, 2009 -- Cue the catchy lyrics from the popular songstress, Beyoncé Knowles, whose advice to suitors now seems apropos for modern women buying men's engagement rings for their fiancés. Traditionally, women bought engagement gifts for their beaus, such as a watch, but now, with a movement that may be considered a natural evolution, some men are wearing engagement rings.

"The definition of engagement is more generous today than it was just a few decades ago, with extended engagement periods that can last several years and, with ladies popping the question," said Ron Yates, founder, Titanium-Jewelry.com. "Along with this shift, we see an uptick in the sale of men's engagement rings, letting the world know that a man has been claimed and that he is unavailable. As a trusted advisor on contemporary metals, Titanium-Jewelry.com is at the service of couples looking for a modern twist on the typical engagement ring, many of whom opt for palladium, titanium, tungsten and black diamond rings."

While more popular in certain countries, male engagement rings may be gaining favor in the U.S. for a few reasons. With the cost of weddings, couples are extending their engagements to save up for the big day, or to complete their education. Working women are empowered to purchase men's engagement rings; bolder yet are those who propose to their mates. Gender equality aside, some men are happy to wear a ring symbolizing the end of their bachelorhood.

In an effort to provide for this niche, Titanium-Jewelry.com offers an extensive selection of engagement rings for men. A trusted guide to contemporary metals, Titanium-Jewelry.com presents matching his and hers wedding bands, men's wedding rings and rainbow rings.
